WORKING WITH FAMILIES COPING WITH MENTAL ILLNESS

WORKING WITH FAMILIES COPING WITH MENTAL ILLNESS is a comprehensive and interactive full/half day training for individuals who are working with families. Providers are asked to address the many needs of families who may have a child/adolescent with serious emotional disorders and/or a spouse, parent, significant other or sibling with mental illness. Often the individual(s)/family’s needs are challenging due to the diversity of the family and the availability of (or lack of) community-based services.

This training will provide the chance for those working with families to gain new insights and knowledge that can enable them to successfully engage family members and improve the outcome for the individual with serious emotional disorders/mental illness.

This training offers participants an opportunity to learn new strategies to address family’s needs through a Life Interrupted presentation. This presentation is made by family members who will share their perspective of living with a loved one with mental illness, the impact of the illness on the family member(s) as individuals and as a unit, and how providers can alleviate some of the frustrations and pain. Using a case study, discussion, empathy exercises and group activities, participants will explore their own biases and attitudes toward mental illness, learn new tools that can be shared with families to improve problem solving and communication skills so families may become partners in the treatment process.

An overview of common disorders will be presented and participants will be taught effective communication techniques that can be utilized when an individual is symptomatic.
Each participant will receive a training packet that will include science-based information, handouts on communication and problem solving strategies, a Guidebook and a list of resources for specific age groups.

As one provider shared in an evaluation “I felt I gained a lot. The family perspective was so helpful and raised my awareness of their needs. The strategies and suggestions on communication and problem solving will be things I will certainly use!”
