Law enforcement officers are often the first on the scene of a crisis involving someone with mental illness or in extreme emotional distress. Handling these situations requires specific tactical and communication skills and an understanding of the resources available. Research has demonstrated that the proper response from law enforcement can reduce the amount of time on a call and increase safety for all involved.

NAMI NH offers training based on national standards and best practices for law enforcement. These trainings include: interactive case scenarios and role plays that teach safe; de-escalating interventions; presentations from people with mental illness and family members to provide insights into their personal experiences and; discussion on how to engage the person with mental illness and community resources to lead to an effective and safe disposition.

“I’ve learned to be patient, non-judgmental, empathic and professional”

“Make it a requirement for all new recruits.”

“This was by far one of the most effective, interesting, and useful trainings that I have been to. It was a very good reminder that these type of issues are common, and may be presented in a wide variety of calls. Very good class”
